[David Attenborough]

Everyone had told us that the river was infested with man-eating crocodiles but it wasn't until one morning, three weeks after our arrival in Borneo, when I was looking for frogs that were whistling and chirping in the swamps fringing the river bank, that I actually saw one.

And it was no ordinary one either but the variety with the long thin nose – a Gaviar. But as you can see, no one could class this little baby as man-eater even though he has got quite a bite.
